

languages

communication bonds peers

Regardless of their major, each student was required to enroll in a language course. Language was necessary for all students, whether they were from the United States or other countries, and was vital to communicate with one another. Bonds between students of various backgrounds were formed as knowledge of different cultures and languages was shared. Students in Dr. Elaine Coney's classes were thoroughly educated in both English and Spanish, and these pupils spent the year being fully prepared to use their innovative skills in the vast professional world.

Public Speaking courses gave students the opportunity to overcome their speaking anxiety and gain incredible confidence. By the end of the year, students in these classes were well equipped with the information on how to properly communicate in various types of conversation. World Literature classes also allowed curious students to examine works from around the globe and throughout history. Whether it was English, Public Speaking, or foreign language, students put their best foot forward and came together to better their knowledge of communication and linguistics.

by Madison VanNess and Eva-Marie Luter

opposite page: Allison Howel and Alexandra Jackson team together as they play language bingo; above: Devin Coon presents his speech about Willis Carrier; above right: Rebeca Tally speaks to the class with anticipation.